

efficiency depends on the head of the concern. Its organization must be essentially military. Mere size develops a multiplicity of duties which go beyond the human limitation."

"How about the results we are getting on the Panama canal?" he was asked.

"Ah," he said, with a smile, "now you talk of another principle. I am discussing private monopoly, not public monopoly. I am speaking of capitalistic business, not of social enterprise.

"Every man works either for gain or for love. Social love—love of country, love of our fellowmen—brings other and far different forces into action.

"Our problem now is to determine whether we shall permit existing system of capitalistic business to go on under the forms of private monopoly or whether we shall compel it to return to competition.

"I say we cannot, must not, shall not endure private monopoly; that we can, must and shall use all the powers of government to restore competition.

"And that we must supplement this policy by encouraging co-operation among consumers, as they have done in England, in order that we may have a shield against the dangers of capitalistic business even when competition is restored."

Such was the testimony of Louis D. Brandeis in support of Senator LaFollette's bill supplementing the Sherman anti-trust law. He stood the fire of questions from trust senators for three days and ended as he began—master of the situation.
